The HIV epidemic in sub-Saharan Africa is marked by exceedingly high and persistent rates of HIV-1 acquisition in young women, and progress in reducing this risk of HIV acquisition has been sluggish. Although infant feeding patterns and the extended use of antiretroviral drugs in HIV-1-infected women have been identified as modifiable risk factors for young women, there are no effective interventions to directly modify the intrapartum exposures that lead to infant HIV-1 acquisition. In the proposed study, we will develop a theory-based behavioral intervention aimed at preventing infant HIV-1 acquisition. Our research plan will first address the component behaviors that comprise each of the intrapartum exposures known to increase infant HIV-1 acquisition. Next, we will develop a comprehensive theory-based intervention by incorporating the key modifiable aspects of the component behaviors into a behavioral model. Finally, we will conduct a pilot study to test the acceptability and feasibility of the proposed behavioral intervention to women who deliver infants in Kigali, Rwanda. If the proposed behavioral intervention is shown to be feasible and acceptable by Rwandan women, we will proceed with a larger randomized clinical trial that will include 200 HIV-uninfected
